Saving Up For The Adolescent Years

By admin

Have you considered putting aside extra funds for the teenage years?

If you have not thought about this, then you may want to if you have a child that is quickly headed towards the adolescent years. This can be a turbulent time, not just with the emotion and drama it can bring, but also with all of the associated expenses that it can add to the family budget.

When you think of your family financial strategy, you need to consider each and every phase of life. To their detriment, many families do not consider just how expensive the adolescent years can be.

New Situations Mean New Expenses

When you consider all of the obvious expenses alone, the adolescent years can be downright costly. You may think that the baby and toddler years drain the bank account, but consider the 'normal' expenses that adolescence can bring.

Saving up for expenses like extracurricular activities, summer camps, school trips, sports teams, the growing need for clothes, increased food expenses, and all of the lessons and tutors that are required for school and additional activities, not to mention the car and driving lessons, can be a huge financial drain, even though necessary. Moreover, many of your regular household expenses can expand just because you are adding a teen to your list: insurance, fuel, maintenance, all of these things and many others can quickly grow a budget.

The above expenses are the normal, everyday type of adolescent expenses, which does not assume if your child requires any additional help in the way of counseling, summer school, or even more extreme measures depending on their ability to adjust well to the changing and turbulent times. There really is no telling what the teen years can bring. And then of course, just beyond them is setting your child up for life beyond your walls. Suddenly the list is growing indeed.
